Many women worldwide still go about their daily routines as their mothers and grandmothers have done for generations: others have gone outdoors to work side by side with men. Are these women satisfied with their new situation? What do they complain about? Here is a career woman, Tamara Ivanova. 43, Russia, giving her opinion about her new way of living.

Ivanova, who was interviewed on the condition that her real name would not be used, is a biologist. She shares a two-bedroom apartment in Moscow with her husband, mother-in-law and one of her two adult children. She enjoys her job as an analyst of forensic pathology and earns a yearly salary of about 4,800$, the same as similarly qualified men in her profession.

As a young mother, she received paid maternity leave and day care. Her family now has free health benefits. Ivanova, in short, has the sort of rights and professional opportunities that are a dream for most of the world's women. Nonetheless, she is angry about the conditions Russian women must endure: "After a woman marries in our country, she no longer lives. She only exists," says Ivanova. "She is always short of sleep. A married Russian woman has three professions: her career, motherhood and house-keeping. They take all her time and energy, and she is left a worn-out wreck". She is critical of Russian men for scorning domestic chores, though she admits that it is a fault more of tradition than of discrimination. "Women run this country," Ivanova says, "but the bosses are men". She reads underground feminist literature but considers herself neither a dissident nor a feminist. "For women's conditions to improve there has to be a change in the whole society. Men must share the burdens of the family".
