

A REALLY EQUAL PARTNER

- 1- John works two days a week in a London library. He job-shares with a woman colleague and spends the rest of the time at home. Pam, his wife, is a full time advisory home economics teacher with plenty of out-of-hours commitments. John looks after the children when Pam is at work, cooks the evening meal twice a week and they share responsibilities during their holidays.
- 2- John comes from a large Belfast family and is one of eight children. " There was no question of not helping, " he remembers. " We all did including my father. "By the time I was 12, I could cook dinner to the family with help from my mother. When his own children were very young, John worked full time and Pam had part-time work, but when Pam was offered the opportunity of a responsible full-time job, they did not want to use childminders and so John decided it should be he who reduced his working hours to look after children.
- 3- Although John does occasionally resent getting so little financial reward for his work and misses the responsibility he lost, he feels he is well-suited to the arrangement he and Pam now have. " We know that other couples are better off than us, " he says, " and that we are unlikely to have a house with all modern conveniences or an expensive car, but that doesn't worry us. I suppose it might do later. Right now being with the children is just more important to me than a successful business career and a fast lifestyle. "
- 4- When it is Pam's turn to cook the evening meal, John tackles other household chores, and once a week he does a big supermarket shop, usually on Friday nights. " That's Pam's time to be with the children, " he says. Pam has learned not to be too concerned about the standard of housework. Most of it simply doesn't get done at all, but of what is accomplished, John is responsible for about 60 to 70 per cent, because he has more time. He is by no means a great fan of laundry work. But it is John who gets very angry if anything happens to make the washing even more of a chore than it is already. " If Pam buys a red garment which will run in the wash, I make my disgust pretty clear, " he says. " As for the ironing, I'll do anything to get out of it! "
- 5- Interestingly enough, despite his great involvement with Andrew and Thomas, John feels that Pam is still the 'mother' of the family and that the boys look to her more than to him for affection. Pam thinks this a throwback to a long tradition: " Women are freer to express all emotions. John is affectionate, but showing it doesn't come naturally to him – or to most men I suspect. He has to make an effort. "
- 6- Pam and John seem to have all taped but reaching this level of smooth operation has been an uphill struggle. " Pam and I are very different people, " says John, " with strong views on all kinds of subjects, particularly politics and religion. To get this far we've had to talk it all through at every stage. "
