NUTRITIONAL FACTORS

Though no successful weight reducing regimen has been found out, many factors that help obese people lose weight have been identified.

METABOLIC RATE

The basal metabolic rate or BMR refers to the amount of fuel or calories the body burns when it is not active. British studies showed that just as two different cars may require different amounts of fuel to go the same mile, two different people performing a similar task may use up different amount of energy. Even when sitting perfectly still, a person with tense muscles would burn more calories than one whose body is completely relaxed, according to Dr. S. Danowski of the University of Pittsburgh.

EXERCISE

The benefits of exercise in weight control extend beyond the number of calories burnt during the activity. Any kind of exercise is helpful provided it involves prolonged movement of the body's long muscles, as does walking, running and swimming...

In a study in California, 34 obese persons who had failed to maintain a weight loss on diet alone were started on a daily exercise program while consuming an unrestricted diet. All 11 who persisted for a year or more, most of them walking at least half an hour a day, lost weight - 11 kilos on the average - without dieting.

EATING PATTERNS

Studies have shown that fat people tend to eat fewer meals than thin ones. Many overweight people report that they regularly skip breakfast, have a light lunch, if any at all, and consume most of their calories at dinner. Yet they are fatter than other people who consume more calories divided among three meals a day.

Although the evidence on this point is conflicting, a number of studies have suggested that a high caloric meal a day - especially at the end of the day - is more likely to go to fat than the same number of calories spread out in small meals throughout the day.

In a recent study at the University of Minnesota, people fed on a 2,000-calorie meal a day in the morning lost weight. But when the same people were fed the same meal in the evening, they gained weight. The time at which meals are consumed influences weight.
